Introduction

The Community Resource Handbook began because of a request from a Patrick B. Harris Psychiatric Hospital (HPH) pharmacist for a list of community resources. Pharmacist Jackie Waldrop stated that former clients would call periodically and ask for information about area mental health centers or community resources. The difficulty locating information necessary in composing the list made it apparent that there was no central, concise list of countywide resources available in the South Carolina Department of Mental Health (SCDMH) Region B. That is not to say the resources are not readily available, just that no one location was found to assist professionals, client supporters, or clients in contacting those providers. When the concept of the handbook was researched as part of a Certified Public Manager project, the need for the booklet was obvious based on requests by clients, caregivers, HPH department representatives and staff members.

The Community Resource Handbook addresses the HPH mission of "...continuing care..." and "...coordination of total care, and continuity of aftercare."* The hospital goals speak of "...community linkages and the continuum of care," "outstanding... customer service," and "implementing... accurate internal/external communication."* The desire of the author since conception of the project has been to create a client-centered document. Client centered, however, does not mean only for the client. The handbook is designed to not only be client friendly but also meet the needs of caregivers, professionals, and community members in the continuum of care.

The objective of the project is to support the efforts of the mental health community, inform client supporters, and assist clients in their request for a full, productive life. It provides a concise listing of countywide community resources for the productive life. It provides a concise listing of countywide community resources for the fourteen counties in SCDMH Region B. A goal is that the handbook be made available to clients or caregivers upon discharge, distributed to health care providers, posted on various health-related websites, and given to interested community members. Also, the handbook will be a “living” document. It will be reviewed and revised periodically based upon the input of stakeholders.

Review Information Sources

Before the project began, information relative to the handbook was available only by searching multiple sources. Those sources included the SCDMH website, Internet searches, telephone book entries, or word of mouth from colleagues and friends.

Gathering the information a client, client supporter, or professional needed was done on a case-by-case basis. The process was time consuming and extremely inefficient. A service provider, phone number, or address might be known but there was no single source to reference to get the desired information. One resource might provide the name of a provider but the address or phone number would have to be sought from another. The problem was to organize the service providers topically and search until contact information was located on each entry.

Methodology

The first step in beginning the project was brainstorming about the potential contents of the booklet with concerned mental health stakeholders. The contents would have to be organized by topic. After the topics were chosen, the names of providers within each category would be named. Contact information would then be located for each provider.

Representatives of several HPH departments provided input. Admissions and Discharge, Activity Therapy, Finance, Legal, Medical Staff, Nursing, Pharmacy, Psychology, Quality Management, and Social Services all provided valuable information. Sources outside HPH included employees of the Greenville Mental Health Center, the Anderson/Oconee/Pickens Mental Health Center, Anderson county residents, retired HPH employees, social services employees, HPH interns, and former HPH clients. A skeleton draft for the handbook was derived from this input. This skeleton was made up of the topics suggested through this brainstorming.

To evaluate the draft, create the final product, evaluate its usefulness, and plan for future handbooks, a series of surveys were planned. Survey participants would be divided into three groups, clients, client supporters, and professionals/staff. Each survey would include a five-point evaluation scale and an all important comments section.

The first survey would be used to measure the need for each handbook category. Responses to these surveys would dictate the final content and structure of the handbook. The second survey would serve to evaluate the usefulness of the product. This survey would indicate user satisfaction with the handbook. The final survey would be taken six months after distribution of the handbooks. Input from this survey would be used to improve and revise the contents of the project.

Results

One hundred sixteen original surveys were collected. The surveys overwhelming supported the need for the handbook and its original design. Results indicated that some topics could be merged but the basic structure of the booklet remained very similar to what was suggested through brainstorming. However, one important addition was suggested. The surveys requested that public transportation information be a topic in each handbook.

Other interesting information gathered from the first survey comes from comparisons between the groups of survey takers. Professionals/staff members' responses mirrored those of client supporters. Both groups showed the most support for the categories that included information pertaining to mental health centers, mental health satellite centers, emergency contact numbers, and support group contact information. Between 73% and 89% of each of these two groups felt these topics would be very useful in the handbook. Both client supporters and professionals/staff members identified the same two areas as least useful. These two categories were educational contact information and recreation contact information. Education contact information was named as very useful by 45% of professionals/staff members and 47% of client supporters. Regarding recreation contact information, only 35% of professionals felt this information was very useful while a mere 26% of client supporters rated this topic very useful.

Clients were enthusiastic about all topics listed on the survey. Each topic was considered very useful by between sixty and ninety percent of respondents. Clients differed with professionals and supporters in three significant areas. Clients were very interested in educational information and recreational information. They replied that this information was very useful by sixty-two and sixty-nine percent respectively. That is a difference of over 20% compared to both professionals' and supporters' survey responses. The final interesting aspect of the client surveys was their rating of the usefulness of prescription help contact information. Sixty-nine and seventy-one percent of professionals and supporters ranked this information as very useful. Eighty-three percent of clients believed this information would be very useful. This indicates an anxiety level regarding prescription help on the part of clients. It could be argued that clients feel this will be the most important information for them in the handbook. Their enthusiasm for this topic is only matched by their interest in information regarding mental health center contact information.

Based on the data collected from the surveys, it was concluded that all topics listed on the survey should remain in the Community Resource Handbook. As stated earlier, the topic of public transportation was included because of interest indicated in the survey comment sections. The only area that possibly could have been edited from the book based on the survey data was recreation contact information. Again, supporters and professionals showed little support for inclusion of this category. However, client interest was high so the information will remain available.

With the support of survey data, the structure of the handbook as indicated by the topic categories was determined. Next, the collection of handbook information began for each county. The original group of stakeholders that helped design the structure of the book was consulted again. They provided names of important agencies and some contact information. However, the majority of the information within the handbook is the result of extensive Internet searches. Countless hours were required to find the data for each handbook. The hours necessary to complete each section within the handbook reinforced the original concept and need for the booklet. The searches were extensive and time consuming for a specialist in medical searches. Professionals, caregivers, and mental health clients rarely would have the time, resources, or expertise to find the information within the book. The effort necessary for each search would only add to frustration and stress already felt by struggling clients, supporters, or overworked staff members.

The mass of data collected for review could better be measured in inches than numbers of pages. Information to be included had to be prioritized, organized, and tested for legitimacy or accuracy. Many agencies were contacted personally. Colleagues recommended others. United Way websites were very useful in this portion of the process.

Next, a database was created in Access. Information was entered that would become a portion of the final product. The database is designed for ease in editing information as changes become necessary or as the handbook is revised. Reports on the handbook information are generated in Crystal Reports and then exported to Word where it is converted to booklet form. From Word, the booklet is converted to Adobe Acrobat so it can be saved in Acrobat Reader format (PDF).

Hard copy booklets were then produced for initial review by selected stakeholders. These stakeholders then completed survey two to measure the usefulness of the final Community Resource Handbook. Ninety-seven percent of the respondents agreed or strongly agreed that the Community Resource Handbook was very useful. Professionals/staff and client supporters strongly agreed with its usefulness at a rate of 94%. One hundred two professionals/staff, client supporters, or clients completed the survey.

With the booklets complete and distribution begun, the final survey was created. This survey will be used to evaluate and revise the handbooks. While a regular review is planned, these surveys will request input from stakeholders after a six month period.

Summary and Conclusions

In conclusion, the Community Resource Handbook will fill a void for professionals, client supporters, and clients. A wealth of support is available to each of these stakeholders but access can be difficult. Inefficiency abounds because of disorganization of relative information. Frustration is a byproduct of this inefficiency.

The Community Resource Handbook will be a living document, open to improvement and updated on a regular basis. Input will be sought from a variety of sources. Those updates will then be distributed electronically and with the use of hard copies. Periodic evaluations will be made of the document on both a formal and informal basis. Professionals and community members have expressed an eagerness for the first handbooks to be made available.
